Satellites

In this city, the skies never lie:
that twinkling you see up there is all just satellites.

We've known this since we were seven, first taught that wishing stars only existed in movies, reserved for pretty blonde kids with talking puppies who lived in white picket-fence houses generally located in the palm of Walt Disney.

They taught us instead to wish upon satellites.

Maybe that's how you ended up in a job you never knew existed: no child could have wished for a title that complicated, especially not one that includes the words
'audit' and 'assistant'.

This city's skies get lower as we grow taller,
draw us closer together.
I think there's a formula.

I think it starts when we're 12:
your Mum shows you a pack of contraceptive pills saying, don't ever let me see these in my house.

At 16, you realise what she really meant was, when you have sex at your boyfriend's that very first time, remember to tell her you're staying at mine.

I think it started when we started to understand that it would take two pairs of hands to protect ourselves when the satellites came down hard upon us.

Then we're scurrying around the rubble pretending we can't be found, getting lost in halos of midnight streetlamps, getting action in school stairwells but only ever feeling like sinners when we were late for family dinners.

See, in this city, the skies never lie.
They just practise selective truth-telling.

For your grandma has a heart condition:
when she offers to set you up with the pastor's son, it's best not to mention your college reputation or that thing with that guy who got you into auto-erotic-asphyxiation.

This city wants us
acting our age now– getting careers and fiancés.

So I escaped to some other city, somewhere out of sight, to find out what all the streets we read about in those books we hid under our beds realy looked like, leaving you to find distraction on fire escapes on you lunch breaks, with that song -writer kid you no longer kiss, who for you, shoplifts condoms and digs his fingers into you when he comes.

You've learnt to be realistic now, learnt to barter to get what you want:
trading touch for meaning trading meaning for sex trading sex for some pirated Blu-Ray, high-definition version of love, without all the risk of your heart getting mauled.

Good sex can lead you to believe anything, but best sex always helps you forget everything.

Except for the time when they taught us that there were no stars left, told us, keep your head down, put your faith in satellites instead.

They warned us about the drug-takers, the failures, the smokers, mini-skirt wearers, class-skippers, school drop-outers, the ones who got pregnant. They failed to mention the myth-makers, risk-takers, mid-morning tokers, mid-climax hair pullers,

and the poetry of post-coital tobacco smoke against clear night skies on the rooftops of shopping centres.

But in the morning, you'll remember that the only love you'll ever require will be found in yourself, and in our voices on the phone later.

In every city, the skies never lie: here in London, the traffic fumes will erase the stars again tonight.

So let's wish upon one more satellite, the one delivering my words to your ear over three oceans, two continents and just one tiny skip over a tiny sliver of the Milky Way.

For we are this city —
from its love hotels,
its fire escape stairwells,
to its blurry gay bars.
And we still have these streets tonight: I think if you just tilt them right, there's still a bit of adventure left.

I still know you
and we're both not rich or married yet,
and I think this means that we're not too old
to start dreaming.
